THE MAZES OF INSURANCE LAW. THE LAW OF INSURANCE, including Fire, Life, Accident, Guarantee and other Non-Marine Risks, By Arthur Biddle, M. A. Philadelphia, Kay & Brother, 1893. 2 vols. pp. ciii, 649, 764.

The law writers have found it necessary to use their pens very diligently to keep pace with the ever-changing phases of the law of contracts grow-ing out of modern industrial and commercial advancement. The multiplication of treaties upon special branches of the law is frequently comined of by practitioners as burdensome, both to plained of by practitioners as burdensone, both their purses and their time. It is true that many of the works that have come from the presses of the law publishers within the last five years, fur-nish sufficient justification for the complaints of the nish sufficient justification for the compiants of the lawyers. Not a few of them consists of little more than disconnected paragraphs, leasily strung together and pretending to give synopses of leading decisions covering the subjects under consideration. Such labor as this finds legitimate scope in a general digest, when properly done; but unfortunately the most of it is not properly done and bears unmistakable evidence of the immature and inexperienced minds whose aid has been invoked by the too busy practitioner who lends his name and reputation to the title page. If, as is sometimes said, every reputable attorney owes to his profession a debt which can only be cancelled by the production of some legal work upon a sub-ject with which he is especially familiar, he is certainty bound to pay that debt in the good coin of his own personal research and labor, and not merely as an editor of the crude "copy" prepared by the young law clerks employed by him for that purpose. If this were the invariable rule followed by the law-book authors of ability and reputation, the members of the bar would buy new treatises with more confidence and find in them much less occasion for criticism and complaint than at pres-This emphasis is laid upon a frequent defect in recently published law books, not because the vol-umes before us illustrate such defective work, but ecause, on the contrary, they furnish the best of recent instances of the manner in which law treatises should be produced to be of real value. It no disparagement to the modest but excellent book of Professor Richards, or others of its kind lately issued, to say that Mr. Biddle has here given us the most comprehensive and thorough treatise that has yet appeared on the subject of insurance law. Lawyers will even forgive him the size of the work when they discover how conscientiously he has performed his duty, how fully he has covered every phase of his subject and yet how free the volumes are from "padding" to swell the bulk of the printed matter. There is evidence on nearly every page of the special knowledge of the author. When it is remembered that the chief life in-surance companies of this city are among the great-est of existing financial institutions and that many ons of American citizens are directly and pe cuniarily interested in the various insurance corporations that have their principal offices within a radius of half a mile from the New-York Custom House, it becomes easy to appreciate the importance of the law governing the various forms of in-surance contracts. The student of insurance law and the writer upon it has this advantage, that it is of comparatively recent origin; and, in fact, the most important of all the adjudi-cations on the subject have been made within a single generation. Yet the expansion of the system of insurance has been so vast and the novel questions ever arising have been so multitudinous that insurance law has already swollen beyond modest ortions and promises to usurp the place now held by railroad law as the leading subject of modern jurisprudence. It also has this peculiarity, that more or less familiarity with its salient principles and controlling decisions is essentially not alone for the lawyer but for insurance business men. A great work on insurance law, therefore, that completely fulfils its mission must furnish to the learned lawyer all the aid he needs in the successful conduct of insurance litigation and must also provide answers to the numberless legal questions that are constantly presenting themselves in the actual conwork will go a long way toward satisfying the ex-isting need of such a comprehensive treatise, any intelligent, even though cursory, examination of these volumes is sufficient to show. The lawyer and the insurance man will find in these volumes the exposition of the law, so far as it has yet been ecided, controlling the insurance contracts with thich they have to deal; and other business men who care to be well informed as to the value and significance of the policies upon which they are every year paying premiums will find here much to interest and help them. It is often said that not al estate owner in a hundred has read through from fire. Probably the proportion of those have carefully read the provisions of their life rnishes excellent proof of the honesty and good faith with which the great insurance corporations conducted, that so few instances arise where any one has occasion to regret his failure to take greater precaution. Yet we venture to say that if any prudent business man will examine Mr. Bid-dle's work, and particularly the portions relating to "the performance of the contract" and the many cases cited of litigations arising solely from the fil some part of his contract, he will quickly be con in the making of insurance contracts as in all managers of well-conducted insurance companies themselves to have their policy-holders be

Their success in that respect is equal to the magnitude of their exertions and to spect is equal to the magnitude of their exertions and to the intellectual ability employed. Their vast unity dwealth and attending dignity is a tangible thing, perceptible to the senses at all times, throughout all Christendom, and it impresses the mind with far greater power than can be done by any mere matter of oninion, which is all there is to show for the pretended effects of Christianity. It is an inherited opinion and exists in the mind only. Their real failure is obscured by the brilliancy of their success in securing worldly goods and honors for themselves. They will usually pass in stience any disabnorable conduct of members, because a trial would advertise a failure. On the other hand, trials for heresy magnify the pretended the other hand, trials for here-y mignify the pretended importance of their explanatory doctrines and are selflaudatory; hence upon such charges they are prompt and merelless. The same men who will condone offences that religion is intended to prevent will all the world with their religion is intended to prevent will fill the work with the contentions over figments of opinion regarding conditions in a future existence of which they know absolutely nothing. Nature's conservation is secured by certain laws of the mind whereby we not only inherit ideas, but are chiefly governed by them.
